DRIFT FENCES IN THE FOREST

Lands of the United States
Built to Facilitate Handling of Live Stock.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 12.—In order to control the movement of sheep and cattle grazed under permits on the national forests, the government is constructing what are known as drift fences which facilitate the counting and handling of the animals. These fences also help to regulate the time when stock must enter the forests, so that sheep and cattle can be kept out in the early spring until the young grass and other forage plants have had a chance to get a start. In some cases, too, they restrict grazing to certain areas and serve either to protect some grazing grounds or to secure a complete utilization of the forage on others.

What is a Drift Fence? The drift fences are not enclosures but generally extend for long distances across the country, much like the "drift fences" or snow fences along railroad rights of way. The railroad fences, however, take their name from the fact that they serve to pile the wind-blown snow to the windward side of the track, so it will not settle in the cuts and impede traffic. The drift fences for stock keep the animals from going in certain directions, or "drifting" to use a cattlemen's expression, or restrict them to specified areas for the winter and to others for summer. They may also prevent stock from grazing upon areas where poisonous plants are found; thus they lessen the cost of herding and prevent losses.

Examples of the use of drift fences are furnished in several built on the Dixie forest of Utah, where stock grazing is important. Five miles of drift fences were built by the government on this forest to protect the water supply of the city of St. George from contamination by forage range cattle. This, with other stretches of substantial wire fence in connection with rocky ledges, which are equally good barriers against stock, makes the southern boundary of one of the divisions of the forest stock proof except at certain established gates.

During the coming year sixteen miles of fence is to be built across the northern part of this division. This will distinctly separate the northern range from that to the south, which is on an average some 3,000 feet higher and will be used exclusively as summer range. By keeping the stock on the separate areas until the forage on the other has had a chance to start, both winter and summer range will be greatly improved and their carrying capacity increased.

TRADE COMMISSION IS "THE THIRD ARM"

Of the Government Declares a
Professor in the Columbia University.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12.—Henry R. Seager, professor of political economy of Columbia University, New York, told the convention of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States here today that he regarded the proposed creation of an Interstate Trade Commission as worthy of unequalled support. In urging the creation of the commission, he said, President Wilson voiced the mature judgment of students of the true problem.

"The bill was drawn," said Mr. Seager, "to give the broadest powers to the commission without in any degree weakening the responsibility of Attorney General McReynolds for enforcing, or the authority of the courts for interpreting, the anti-trust act."

Mr. Seager charged that the commission "to be entrusted with responsibility of determining the application of the anti-trust act to specific plans of business." "One need not be the severest son of the seventh sea," he added, "to foresee that the commission will be the strong arm on which the gibes of the attorney general and the courts will come to lean."

The speaker declared that the proposed bill defining the Sherman law, recommended as one the administration's reform measures, was unnecessary and harmful in conformity with the narrowest and most dogmatic conviction that every departure on the part of business men from unrestrained competition necessarily results in restraint of trade and is therefore to be condemned.

Another interesting development is four and one-half miles of drift fence on the Fishlake forest in the same state. It was built to keep cattle on the north side and horses on the south while larkspur grows in abundance. Larkspur is very poisonous to cattle, but it is not eaten at all by horses. Before this fence was built sixty cattle had died in one month, June, after it was built and the cattle were excluded from the larkspur area there was a further loss of only five, though July and August are considered by cattlemen in Utah the worst months for larkspur poisoning. Forest officers therefore have estimated that this fence, which cost $740, saved $2,500 in the first year it was built, and should save $4,000, or save times its cost, each season. It is said, too, that it increases the carrying capacity of the grazing district about fifteen per cent.

Two other fences in the same state costing $2,100, will, on a conservative estimate by cattlemen, save approximately $6,000 a year.

Co-operative Projects.

In certain areas where the fences will greatly minimize the problems of the forest officers in handling cattle within the national forests, the cost is borne by the government. In other areas where the benefits to stockmen have been shown they are built in co-operation with the cattlemen, who pay a large part of the expense or furnish the labor. Throughout the national forests there are cattle and sheepowners' associations which represent individuals who graze their flocks and herds upon the national forests. All differences which arise between the forest officers and the individual owners are submitted to the advisory boards of these associations, and they are therefore clearing houses for the settlement of any difficulties which may need adjustment. According to the officials of the service, these associations have practically eliminated controversies and the officers who administer them are in perfect accord with the policies of the government. One of the evidences of this is shown in the drift fences which help both sides.
